After years of touring the world, both Eli Maiman and Benjamin Wayne found themselves in the same place at the same time, their previous chapters complete, their futures unwritten.

Eli had helped take WALK THE MOON to global success with "Shut Up and Dance," one of the biggest pop-rock songs of the decade. Meanwhile, fronting BAD VEINS, Benjamin had earned a reputation as a theatrical craftsman, staging concerts around a vintage reel-to-reel machine as a bandmate, turning every show into something closer to a happening than a concert. Simultaneously, he sharpened his instinct for hooks writing music for national TV campaigns.

Two free agents, living three miles apart, starting over.

What began as a conversation about what comes next turned into something neither of them planned. They talked about building a studio. They talked about starting a podcast (heaven forbid). But they kept coming back to the one thing they'd never been able to walk away from.

The Fight was born.

The album begins with the first song they wrote together. It's called "Starting With Nothing." The chorus, "I'm starting with nothing with you, but I want to make something with you" could just as easily be sung to a collaborator, a partner, a bandmate. That wasn't a coincidence.

Once they started writing, they couldn't stop. Ben had never co-written before, and something about the collaboration opened a door he didn't know was there. Their debut album, This Time I Swear, is at once both WALK THE MOON, BAD VEINS, and something new altogether.

The album finds Wayne and Maiman grappling with doubt. With heartbreak. With all the things that could drag you under. But The Fight keeps making the same choice, song after song, to not let the hard stuff win.

Instead of shutting it down, they're turning it up.
